A WONDERFUL NARRATIVE OF OLD ALEXANDRIA, OR THE CONFESSION OF JOHN TRUST.

CHAPTER 5.

It is needless to say that what I had seen excited me strangely. I thought the matter over, and determined on the morrow to try and ascertain for what purpose Wroe was here, and what had led him to the grave yard, and then I sought forgetfulness upon a couch, but sleep eluded my anxious grasp, and half memories and half dreams haunted me, till from very restlessness, I opened the street door. The moonlight poured a flood over me, and the fresh night wind, like an exorcism drove out the sad spirits which haunted me, with a breath. Wooded by the calmness of the hour, I took my cap and strolled abroad. Silence lay everywhere, floating at my footsteps, only to return when I had passed on. The sad forebodings and inquiet of my chamber, were exchanged for a calm, in keeping with the time, and my reluctant steps took their way. I cared not whether, for go where I would, sweet sleep—unbought by poppy or mandragora—was blessing the earth with unconscious rest, or unrolling wayward panoramas of beautiful dreamland. It was not until I found myself almost embogged in the vats of a tannery that I, myself, ceased to dream of the hours when Blanche Fordeham, and I tossed pretty fancies and quaint conceits into the moonlight—half truth and half bubble—like the stars which sparkled in the sea-spray at our feet.

Changing my route to the southward, I was soon free of the vats, and on climbing the hill saw, not far distant, a cove of cedars which I knew skirted the spot at which I had, a few hours before, witnessed Wroe's anguish. The first view settled my purpose, and climbing the few fences, which were the only intervening obstacles, I entered, reverently, I hope, the place of the dead. I had seen Wroe, I could with ease distinguish the spot, and bent my steps toward it.

I had nearly reached the place, when a figure, which at a glance I knew, emerged from the shadows. He betrayed considerable agitation, and came forward, exclaiming: "Dead or living, I fear, you not, John Trust."

"I knew he did not die, and that he believed as I saw a spectre, for his voice was choked, and tremulous, and the arm he raised, as though to threaten, shook like an aspen. At once, gathering all the calmness I could muster, I undressed him."

"John Trust is not dead, and you have no cause to fear him living. We meet suddenly and strangely, it is true; as much without expectation on my part as on yours."

"His trepidation passed at the first sound of my voice, and he came forward, extended his hand, and said with emotion:

"You know all, then, and like me come a pilgrim to her grave. Trust, you never loved a woman so well; nor can you mourn like me."

"My anticipations were verified; it was the grave of poor Blanche! I feigned no surprise, for I felt none; and after the pause of a few seconds, as though to give me time to speak, if I wished, he continued:

"'Twas the master passion of my life, a vortex that swallowed me up. I must have been, or pride interrupted him."

"You did me no wrong," I said, "She was mistress of her own destiny, and placed it in your hands. 'Tis true, I did hope, but that was my first and last folly."

"You are wrong," he answered, with vehemence. "You are wrong, because I loved her as she did not love me." "Come," he continued, clutching me by the wrist, "Come, and let me offer over her grave such reparation for her wrongs as yet can be done."

"He drew me closer to the spot whence he had emerged, pointing within iron rails to a marble slab, with one hand, whilst he held my wrist by the other, continued to talk, his voice losing its distinctness in its increased vehemence."

"She loved you—you only—I'll tell all the truth. Reparation—wrong—frenzy" was all I could distinguish of the flood which poured out from his lips."

"The fever of anguish shined in word and action, stifled for awhile every thought but that of concern for the tortured man; I calmed him as well as I was able, and entreated him to be silent for a few moments. He threw himself upon the earth, burying his face in the grass, and grasping a young tree which shook with his agitation. After a short time he grew calmer, and relieved of immediate solitude for him, I looked about me. In the midst of the tombs, a small parallelogram had been walled in, and surmounted with an iron railing, within which on a plain marble tablet I read in the clear moonlight:

TO THE MEMORY OF A
whose mortal sufferings terminated on the 4th day of October, 1816, aged 23 years and 8 months.

This stone is erected by her disconsolate husband, in whose arms she breathed out her last sigh, and who, under God, did his utmost to stave off the cold dull hour of death."

"How loved, how honored once awaits thee not, To whom related or by whom begot, A heap of dust alone remains of thee, 'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be."

"This was the grave of my West India Juno! Anxiety to know more of this singular affair prompted me to raise the fallen man from the earth, more speedily, perhaps, than at other times I would have deemed prudent."

"Can I do anything to relieve you?" I asked.

"Yes, yes," somewhat more calmly than before, but still passionately. "Listen to me," and again he drew me towards the tomb, and again poured a stream of utterances entirely unintelligible, save half a dozen unconnected words."

"This iron-railing has long since been carried off piece meal by the predecessors of the present one of Alexandria boys. Many a reader of these lines will find his memory confirm to the spoliation of a rail or two. If Dr. Wroe is the man Trust represents to be, they may yet be brought to account for it."

"Come from here," I said, taking him by the arm; "tell me elsewhere."

"Here, here!" he exclaimed, "HERE must I do her justice."

I humored his whim—"you have done that here. Let us go a few paces and sit down by cool waters—then tell me all you wish. Her spirit abides there as well as here."

He seemed satisfied—I took his arm and led him silently to the bank of Hunting Creek, along whose level beach we passed until, nearing the bridge, we ascended to a cove of trees around an ice-house on the bank, and stood side by side.

The scene was entrancing; and seeing that he was growing easy under the soothing of the hour, I looked upon the waters before me, without a word.

Hunting Creek was spread out in the hush of night, ere moonset. Looking westward a panorama of picturesque beauty glowed before my eyes. The fast-sinking moon was nearly down the West arch of heaven, half hidden by the foliage of a cove of trees which extended nearly across the head of tide-water. Broken by the cascading branches, the moonlight burst like a cascade through an hundred rifts, and spangled the waters with roving islands of light—soft and glowing as though the Master of light had just walked over, and the waters yet glowed in his foot prints. Far down the creek, and away off toward the farther shore of the Potomac, the lucid sheet caught in its bosom a picture of the heavens above, and while the fading rays of the moon still gilded the hills, the waves below held in their tremulous arms the clouds bathed in light and the stars which grew brighter in the moon's decline."

Even as I gazed, the light upon the waters faded perceptibly, warning me that the moon would soon sink behind the hills and leave us to darkness.

I turned to arouse my companion; "ere I did so I felt his hand upon my shoulder. 'I am calm now,' he said, in an even voice, but the gleam of his eye in the darkening shadows told me it was a calm that did not reach the heart. However, I was less excited than I had been at any period since we met—I motioned to the sword and we sat down together, each supported by a tree. 'You need not feel that you have grieved me,' I said, 'I am more than content; the loss of one love gave me another, holier, dearer and more home-like, and as to myself I confess to you that I am glad of what has happened.'"

"You are married then," he said quickly.

"I was not alone for your sake, but for hers that I wished to bury under the breast of a secret which lies heavily upon it, the more so, because to-night I had vowed by her grave, that if you yet lived, and I could anywhere yet hope to find you, I would follow you the world over, nor rest again content, until I had made your ear familiar with wrongs to you and yours, that I would give my life, aye, my salvation to repair, but which (there is a hell in the two words) I CANNOT."

Then he talked the hours away, interrupted only by a word of exclamation, a question or remark of mine. At times, the passing clouds made the night yet darker, so that I could not see the waters that flowed at my feet or the tree against which he lay, but his white face defied darkness, and glance when I would, in the pauses of his words, I could see in its pallid lineaments, emotions which bore witness to the truthfulness of what he told me. Before light came in the East, I knew all he wished, and we strolled into town together.

"Popular memory as exemplified by 'X' in your issue," I said, "fully sustains Trust's narration as to the character of Dr. Wroe. It will be remembered that in Chapter 3, Trust says that Wroe left India because he had not made his accounts with the East India Company quite correct, and that he fled from Paris for fear of arrest for that fraud. It may be, he practiced upon Messrs. Lindsay & Hill, in his manhood, the arts he learned in India in his youth. If John Trust's opinion is correct, Dr. Wroe did not remain long in prison in New York, and he now occupies a prominent position in Europe, where the European reactionists denounce him as 'the most superb villain of modern times.'"
